The program, which debuted in 2015 and is now active in 50 cities, helps Amazon complete the "last mile" for customer orders - the final stretch of a delivery that is short in distance, yet often the most expensive part of the e-c ommerce supply chain. It's becoming increasingly important as Amazon's s hipping costs could balloon to $7 billion this holiday quarter while the tech gi ant meets growing customer expectations - in particular from its Prime members, who pay $99 per year to receive free 2-day shipping on millions of items, among other benefits.

Getting ready to deliver an Amazon package from my car with the Amazon Flex app

I scanned each package with the app and put them in my car. One was extremely he avy and large; I wondered how I was going to actually get this to someone's doorstep by myself.

Next up was an apartment, which proved to be much more complicated. The recipien

As Amazon invests more into its delivery infrastructure, the company's tradi tional retail rivals, including Walmart, Best Buy and Target, are also spending big on their own e-commerce and shipping initiatives in an effort to keep up wit h the e-commerce juggernaut.

Amazon has an advantage over those competitors, in that it can leverage growing profits from its Amazon Web Services cloud computing division to allow its e-com merce operations to run on razor-thin profits margins, and even at a loss.
