Investigators digging into the life of Todd Kohlhepp - the South Carolina man accused of murdering four people, kidnapping a woman and then killing her boyfriend - have found a long trail of macabre online activity they think might be linked to him.

In May 2014, an Amazon user began leaving reviews on products such as weapon mounts, padlocks, shovels and a tourniquet, among others more generic items such as dog toys, chocolate bars and DVD copies of The Walking Dead.

On Jan. 14, 2015, the user reviewed a set of padlocks, saying, "now my locks have locks...place is Hotel California now," apparently referencing The Eagles' song (which contains the line "You can check out any time you like") Tj T* BT

The user said they purchased a knife on Sept. 13, 2014. On the review, they wrote, "havnet (sic) stabbed anyone yet..... yet.... but I am keeping the dream alive and when I do, it will be with a quality tool like this..."

Another product was given five stars and described as "blacker than my soul and priced right."

A second and third body were recovered from two more graves this weekend, according to authorities. That would bring Kohlhepp's alleged body count to at least seven, after he also reportedly confessed to a 2003 quadruple slaying in Chesnee, South Carolina.
