That's awful, art thief seems to not be taken seriously even on a site that requires people to make handmade items. I'm going to open a shop soon, do you think artists should put watermarks even on the pictures? Very faint so we still see the article but enough so it can't be used search for the image. left click on it to save the image. do a google image search.

does it seem like a reasonable price? ie. a hand thrown coffee mug isn't likely to be $3 usd.

Do a search for that exact item, is it in multiple shops? If it's in multiple shops, it's more than likely to be a reseller. Although shop owners do get their pictures stolen and reused on the website.

Here are some tips that may help.

Biggest tip is this: if you don't genuinely believe it is handmade by the shop owner (or a genuine vintage item), don't buy it. And check for anything you're interested in on AliExpress and Amazon and Wish before purchase.

Reviews aren't necessarily helpful. But if you do check them, do it from the shop's main page and sort by "recent" instead of recommended and scroll back through several pages.

There are scam shops on Etsy as well as shops that have been successfully in business for 15 years. There are shops selling genuine beautiful handmade items and shops selling $3 AliExpress stuff for $50-100. It depends entirely on what you're looking for at.
