YouTube creators now have the option of having a channel name different than their Google account's display name.

YouTube

YouTube is finally allowing creators to change their channel name and profile picture without affecting their Google account. YouTube creators will now be able to have a channel name and profile picture that is different from what is shown on their Google account. Until now, changing your YouTube channel name or profile picture would reflect on your Google account as well, and on Gmail.

The new update will be helpful for creators who want to keep only one Google account for YouTube, Gmail and other services. Now creators will not have to create another Google account just for YouTube because of the channel name issue. There is a big catch though. YouTube creators who have the verification badge will lose it if they change their channel name, The Verge reported.

YouTube creators will have to apply for the verification badge again if they choose to change their channel name after this update. This may disappoint creators
