Merchants have historically offered writers on Amazon free products or services in exchange for positive online write-ups. The practice became so rampant that Amazon updated its community guidelines last October to remove incentivized reviews. But still, many retailers are trying to get around the new policy, according to one top-ranked Amazon reviewer.

How does one become an influential Amazon reviewer in the first place?

What is the most expensive item you have received for free in exchange for reviews?

I would say a Bluetooth speaker that is worth $50 or so.

Did anything change after Amazon's crackdown last October?

Now I delete most of the review requests. Since the crackdown and change in policy, I only review things that I have ordered myself because I actually needed or wanted them. I tend to post a couple of reviews a day, several days a week. Frankly, there is no reason at this point to write reviews other than because I know that they are useful to people, based on feedback that I get, and I enjoy writing.

Are they soliciting positive reviews from you?

What needs to change in your opinion?
