Crowdfunding can take many forms, depending on what type of funding you're looking for. If you're looking for startup funds for a specific project, you could rally your followers by setting up a funding goal and hosting live fundraising events.

Fundable. Fundable lets startups offer equity in exchange for funding, making it a great tool for finding investors. Currently, though, Fundable is only available to users in the United States.

Crowdfunding works for big projects, and tipping is the simplest way to collect funds quickly. But what if you're looking to secure a more regular passive income stream? In that case, you might consider using a creator-based subscription platform, like Patreon.

If you're thinking a subscription service might be the best way of monetizing your TikTok account, here are some best practices to keep in mind: There's no one-size-fits-all approach to TikTok, but having a solid understanding of your audience will put you in a better position to find the best ways to monetize your following.
